Why would an Irish musician living in the Netherlands contact a blues rock musician in Colorado?

Mark Gilligan contacted someone he had never heard about before as he started to search for other musicians that were suffering from the same disease that he was, multiple sclerosis (MS).

Mark has performed most of his life which includes performing with such luminaries as Noel Redding from the Jimi Hendrix Experience and now performs with his band the John O Gods throughout Europe. Though always a happy-go-lucky guy, MS is taking its toll, Mark was recently hospitalized because of his weakening legs. In 2005 he contacted Linda Storey, another musician with MS, in Colorado, though an ocean away, MS has brought them together in the fight of their lives to find the cure and to inspire others with MS. Despite the fact that Linda is now in a wheelchair she continues to write and perform. She also is president and founder of CASE for MS and Rockin' out MS, a nonprofit that raises funds to benefit those with MS. Their dream is to record and perform their original music together this spring, May 2008. They will record at John Macy's studios in Denver and then perform their first gig together at the "Rockin out MS" concert and fundraiser, May 22nd at Fados. All three bands have a member with MS or a family member with MS.

THE JOHN O'GODS bring a total new dimension to Irish music while dedicating their every gig to the pleasure of their audience. The band is the brainchild of two Irish musicians Danny Guinan and Mark Gilligan who have been playing as a duo throughout Europe under the guise of Guinan & Gilligan. The success of their first gig as the John O Gods, led them to be booked for the Utrecht Blues Festival where, with not a blue note insight, they stirred the locals into a frenzy with a straight in-your-face blend of Irish music driven by the songs of Ireland. Guinan and Gilligan are renowned for the energy and dynamism of their two-man show, with four it only gets better. By the way the name of the band comes from a hospital in Dublin for alcoholics looking for a cure.
